Organizations are increasingly dependent on the uninterrupted availability of their computing resources and other hardware and software applications. These organizations rely on computing devices to perform important tasks, including finance and accounting tasks, medical diagnoses and treatments, engineering and construction design, scientific analyses and data research, and so forth. Such organizations cannot afford to experience the loss of computing resources due to the unavailability or malfunctioning of the computing devices that provide vital services. It is therefore necessary for organizations and individuals to monitor and maintain their computing resources and other hardware and software applications. Unfortunately, it is not possible or practical for most organizations and individuals to closely monitor their computing resources and other hardware and software applications. To accurately monitor the availability and functionality of resources, organizations and individuals must invest significant amounts of time and money. There is also a problem of scale in that some organizations and individuals may monitor only a few computing devices. Depending on the amount of computing devices and/or other hardware or software applications monitored, it is virtually impossible for organizations and individuals to accurately monitor their resources. If an organization and individual monitor their resources, they are likely monitoring the resources at the wrong times, with incomplete or inaccurate information. Moreover, an organization and/or individual that monitors his or her resources does not have information needed to make an informed decision regarding the need for maintenance and repair of his or her computing resources. It is therefore difficult for an organization and/or individual to determine whether his or her resources need to be monitored or repaired. This problem is compounded if the organization and/or individual monitoring his or her resources make his or her own decisions regarding the need for maintenance and repair of his or her resources based on inaccurate information. The problems associated with monitoring and maintaining hardware and software applications are further compounded if the organization and/or individual monitoring his or her resources are a corporation or an individual that maintains various resources, such as computers, software, and/or hardware. For example, a corporation may have to monitor its computing resources and other hardware and software applications, such as email servers, servers and computers for websites, etc. If the corporation monitors its resources, it will have to spend significant amounts of time and money to make sure the corporation's resources are working properly, or otherwise the corporation may lose time and money with respect to its business operations. Generally, it is extremely difficult for an organization and/or individual to monitor his or her computing resources. It is also extremely difficult for an organization and/or individual to make a determination regarding the need for maintenance and repair of his or
